

ABSTRACT

According to a feature of the invention, a flexible material, such as string, is secured at the base of the plant and also secured to a height taller than the plant. As the plant grows, its heads or vines are twisted in pairs around the respectively secured strings. As a result, the plant produces less foliage, bears more fruit per area of land, and grows to maturity in less time than with many conventional twisting techniques.